THE PATHS TO GRISWOLD

Ryan C. Williams*

INTRODUCTION

Critics have long viewed *Griswold v. Connecticut*¹ as “in many ways a typical decision of the Warren Court.”² But Griswold was hardly a “typical” Warren Court decision. The doctrinal themes with which the Warren Court is most closely associated—such as the protection of racial and religious minorities, refashioning the law of democracy, and solicitude for First Amendment values and for the rights of the criminally accused and the poor³—played either no role or only a tangential role in Griswold. With its focus on sexual privacy, procreative liberty, and unenumerated rights, Griswold shares a much greater affinity with the decisions of the later Burger Court of the 1970s—the period when Griswold first developed significant generative force as a constitutional precedent.⁴

POWE, JR., THE WARREN COURT AND AMERICAN POLITICS 485 (2000) (identifying “judicial reapportionment of legislative bodies, the federalization of criminal procedure, the protection of sexually arousing depictions, [and] the safeguarding of the economic rights of the poor” as among the Warren Court’s “revolutionary” doctrinal contributions).

4 See, e.g., Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973) (holding that the constitutional privacy right recognized in Griswold limits states’ ability to prohibit abortion); *Roe v. Griswold's atypical status among Warren Court decisions suggests that conventional causal accounts of that Court's decision making may have difficulty explaining the Court's decision to embrace an unenumerated right to marital privacy. Consider, for example, Professor Burt Neuborne's recent argument that "concern over racial injustice and state institutional failure . . . played a significant role in shaping" many of the Warren Court's most important decisions.⁵ While racial concerns almost certainly exerted significant influence across a broad range of Warren Court doctrines,⁶ it seems doubtful that such concerns loomed particularly large in Griswold, which involved a criminal prosecution of two upper middle class white defendants. Likewise, analyses that focus on the ideological compatibility between the later Warren Court of the 1960s and that era's dominant national political coalition seem incomplete as an explanation of Griswold.⁷ To be sure, by 1965, national public opinion had tipped decidedly against the policy reflected in the Connecticut contraception statute.⁸ But unlike other major social issues addressed by the Warren Court—such as racial justice, voting rights, and protecting the rights of the impoverished—neither contraception nor sexual privacy implicated core concerns of the era's dominant national political coalition.⁹ Other general explanatory theories of the Warren Court's approach to constitutional decision making have similar difficulties accounting for Griswold.¹⁰

Balkin, What Brown Teaches Us About Constitutional Theory, 90 VA. L. 9 See, e.g., PHYLLIS TILSON PIOTROW, WORLD POPULATION CRISIS 12–87 (1973) (discussing the general reticence of national political leaders to openly discuss policies relating to birth control throughout the 1950s and early 1960s).

10 For example, Professor John Hart Ely's well-known effort to rationalize Warren Court decision making by reference to a "representation reinforcing" theory of judicial review has difficulty accounting for Griswold. See Mark V. Tushnet, Foreword, 77 VA. L. REV. 631, 634 (1991) (observing that "[n]ot even Ely contends that Griswold can be understood in representation-reinforcing terms"); see also JOHN HART ELY, DEMOCRACY AND DISTRUST 219 n.118 (1980) (conceding that the mere antiquity and unpopularity of the statute at issue in Griswold would not have justified invalidation on representation reinforcement grounds).

To the extent scholars have attempted to develop explanatory accounts focusing on Griswold specifically, such accounts have tended to emphasize the social movement activism of birth control advocates and shifting public attitudes toward sexuality, contraception, and women's rights.¹¹ These influences, combined with the Warren Court's well-known penchant for constitutional perfectionism, are generally presumed to account for both the timing of the Court's decision and for the Court's decision to embrace a doctrine of unenumerated constitutional rights.¹² Contrary to the conventional portrait of the Warren Court as an "activist" tribunal, this account portrays the Justices as playing a largely passive and reactive role—as occupying a place in the rearguard, rather than in the vanguard of constitutional change.¹³ To put it in slightly different terms, the social movement account of Griswold tends to emphasize factors external to the judicial process, such as political activism and changes in public opinion and societal mores, rather than doctrinal, intellectual, and other considerations that are more internal to that process.¹⁴

There is a good deal of truth in these narratives. It is difficult to understate the importance of the sustained efforts by the Planned Parenthood League of Connecticut and its supporters in the academic and legal communities who fashioned a litigation campaign that succeeded in placing questions regarding the constitutional status of the right to marital privacy on the Court's agenda and (eventually) persuading the Court to provide an answer. And given the state of national public opinion at the time, the Court's decision to invalidate the Connecticut law was hardly surprising.¹⁵

GARROW, LIBERTY AND SEXUALITY 1–269 (1998); HORWITZ, supra note 3, at 106–11; Neal Devins, The Countermajoritarian Paradox, 93 MICH. L. POL'Y 519, 531 (2008) (characterizing Griswold as "a classic example of the Warren Court's penchant for reaching a result deemed fair (and sensible to most Americans), then trying to find some constitutional justification for it").

13 See, e.g., David A. Strauss, The Modernizing Mission of Judicial Review, 76 U. CHI. L. REV. 859, 878 (2009) (observing that the "Griswold Court . . . was following, not resisting, a [national] trend"); cf. Balkin, supra note 7, at 1549–50 (contending that the role of courts in social reform movements usually involves "confirm[ing] what has already been happening in the larger legal and political culture" rather than leading the direction of constitutional change).

But as is the case with most narratives, the truths told by the social movement account of Griswold are partial and incomplete.¹⁶ For example, if social movement activism and national public opinion alone were sufficient to account for the Court's decision, it would be difficult to explain why a declaration of the Connecticut law's unconstitutionality did not occur until 1965. The litigation campaign seeking to overturn restrictive contraception laws had emerged decades earlier and had already achieved a substantial measure of national success prior to the outbreak of World War II.¹⁷ A constitutional challenge to the specific statute that was eventually invalidated in Griswold first reached the Supreme Court in 1943.¹⁸ And even at that early date, the policy reflected in Connecticut's law—i.e., the criminalization of contraceptive use by married couples—was opposed by overwhelming majorities at the national level.¹⁹ The Court nonetheless chose to dodge the question, as it did again when the issue reached the Court a second time in 1961.²⁰

Nor does the social movement story explain the Court's choice of doctrinal framework to rationalize its decision. Although it is perhaps understandable for modern observers to assume that the approaches surveyed by the various opinions in Griswold exhausted the conceptual possibilities available to the Justices,²¹ contemporary observers recognized the availability of other possible bases for the Court's decision that would not have required accord- ing the unenumerated right to "privacy" the type of strong constitutional protection that had previously been reserved to rights specifically listed in the Constitution.²²

The goal of this Article is to develop a fuller picture of Griswold by situating the case within a series of doctrinal and jurisprudential debates and developments that were prominent at the time of the Court's decision but that have faded in significance over time. This alternative picture of Griswold shifts the focus away from viewing the case as one about birth control, sexual privacy, and women's autonomy and toward viewing the decision as one about interpretive method, constitutional theory, and the Supreme Court's role within the national political system. This alternative perspective on Griswold has by no means gone unnoticed in the massive volume of scholarship discussing the case. But for the most part, such discussions have focused on efforts to either rationalize the result of the case²³ or to criticize its reasoning.²⁴ This Article approaches the case from a different perspective—seeking to neither rationalize nor criticize, to neither praise nor condemn—but rather to simply understand.²⁵

The history of the litigation campaign that culminated in Griswold is a story that has been told, and told well, by others.²⁶ Summarizing greatly, the story can be encapsulated as follows: in the late nineteenth century, a social reform movement led by moral campaigner Anthony Comstock persuaded Congress and the legislatures of multiple states to pass “obscenity” laws that, among other things, prohibited or greatly restricted the sale and use of contraceptives.²⁷ The Connecticut legislature enacted one such law in 1879, which prohibited the “use[]” of “any drug, medicinal article or instrument for the purpose of preventing conception.”²⁸

During the early decades of the twentieth century, birth control advocates succeeded in persuading courts at the federal level and in many states to interpret similar statutes narrowly, by imputing to them an implied “health” exception that allowed for widespread circumvention.²⁹ But this Sunstein, What Did Lawrence Hold? Of Autonomy, Desuetude, Sexuality, and Marriage, 2003 SUP. CT. strategy did not succeed everywhere. In 1940, Connecticut's highest court refused to interpret the 1879 statute as containing a broad "medical needs" exception of the type that had been recognized by other courts.³⁰ Birth control advocates in Connecticut thereafter embarked on a multi-pronged campaign to repeal the law, including both efforts aimed at legislative repeal and litigation challenging the law's constitutionality.

I. THE PATH TO JUSTICIABILITY

The procedural path that the constitutional challenges to the 1879 Connecticut law were forced to navigate was long and arduous, even by the standards of modern constitutional litigation. The principal obstacles standing in the way of an early resolution by the Supreme Court were a set of self-imposed constraints that limited the Court's ability to decide constitutional questions. These limitations were just beginning to take on their modern form at around the time the first constitutional challenges to the Connecticut law arrived at the Court.

It is now conventional to trace the development of the Supreme Court's modern doctrines of standing and related justiciability limitations to the middle decades of the twentieth century and particularly to the decisions of the post-New Deal Court under Chief Justices Stone and Vinson.³¹ The development of these doctrines reflected the influence of certain prominent strains of progressive and New Deal legal thought, which emphasized judicial restraint and the importance of allocating decision-making authority to the most competent institutions.³² The doctrines also had a more practical dimension as a means of insulating New Deal regulation from judicial review.³³

REV. 875, 889 (2008) (noting the existence of an "emerging consensus on the historical origins of standing doctrine" that traces the doctrine's origins to the New Deal period).

³² These ideas were most closely associated with a group of mid-twentieth century scholars who have been retrospectively categorized as adherents of the "legal process school" of legal thought. See, e.g., William N. Eskridge, Jr. & Philip P. Frickey, An Historical and Critical Introduction to THE LEGAL PROCESS, in HENRY M. HART, JR. & ALBERT M. SACKS, THE LEGAL PROCESS, at li (William N. Eskridge, Jr. & Philip P. REV. 163, 179 (1992) (arguing that justiciability limitations were "designed to limit the occasions for judicial intervention into democratic processes" and thereby "insulate progressive and New Deal legislation from frequent judicial attack"); cf. Daniel E. Ho & Erica L. Ross, Did Liberal Justices Invent the Standing Doctrine? An Empirical Study of the Evolution of Standing, 1921–2006, 62 STAN. L. REV. 591 (2010) (questioning

In his 1936 concurrence in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority,³⁴ Justice Brandeis identified seven self-limiting principles through which the Court might “avoid [] passing upon . . . constitutional questions” unnecessarily.³⁵ These limitations included the principle that courts should not “anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it,”³⁶ nor “formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied,”³⁷ nor “pass upon the validity of a statute upon complaint of one who fails to show that he is injured by its operation.”³⁸ Brandeis’s synthesis was immediately influential and provided a set of principles that would guide the development of justiciability doctrines over the ensuing decades.

It was against this backdrop that the first constitutional challenge to Connecticut’s contraception ban arrived at the Supreme Court in 1943. The plaintiff in that case, Dr. Wilder Tileston, had initiated an action in Connecticut state court seeking a declaratory judgment that he could not be prosecuted for prescribing contraceptives to three of his married female patients whose lives would be threatened by pregnancy.³⁹

Tileston’s appeal implicated at least two of the self-limiting principles identified in Brandeis’s Ashwander concurrence—namely, the principle that the Court should not “pass upon the validity of” a law unless the litigant requesting relief could show “that he is injured by its operation,” and the principle that the Court should not “anticipate a question of constitutional law” before the need to resolve it had arrived.⁴⁰ In a terse per curiam opinion, the Court concluded that Tileston lacked standing to assert the constitutional rights of his patients.⁴¹ Noting that the “sole constitutional attack upon the statutes under the Fourteenth Amendment is confined to their deprivation of life” and that there was “no allegation or proof” that Tileston’s life was in danger, the Court concluded that “the proceedings in the state courts present no constitutional question which appellant has standing to assert.”⁴²

The brevity of the Court’s opinion left the scope of its holding ambiguous. On one reading, the case could be understood as standing for a broad prohibition on asserting the constitutional rights of others at all. But the opinion was also susceptible to a narrower reading in which the critical defect was simply the plaintiff's failure to allege that he himself had been injured.⁴³ This latter reading left open the possibility that a plaintiff who could allege some legally cognizable injury in his own right might also challenge aspects of a law that did not affect him directly.

By the time the second constitutional challenge to the Connecticut law began working its way through the courts, it had become apparent that a categorical prohibition on third-party standing was stronger medicine than the Court was willing to swallow. In a 1953 ruling, for example, the Court allowed a white property owner to assert the constitutional rights of third-party African Americans in defending against a suit seeking to enforce a racially restrictive covenant.⁴⁴ In another case decided shortly thereafter, the Court held that the NAACP had standing to assert the First Amendment rights of its members.⁴⁵

Despite the Court's seeming openness to recognizing third-party standing in appropriate cases, Connecticut birth control advocates were understandably wary of again testing the limits of the Court's standing doctrine. The lead plaintiff named in the second major constitutional challenge to the Connecticut law was again a physician—Dr. Charles Lee Buxton.⁴⁶ But this time, the lawyers representing Buxton were careful to include in their complaint an allegation that enforcement of the statute would not only threaten the life and liberty of Buxton's patients but would also deprive Buxton himself of constitutionally protected "liberty" and "property" interests relating to his ability to practice medicine effectively.⁴⁷ More importantly, Buxton was joined by other plaintiffs who alleged direct injury by reason of the contraception ban, including two of his patients (both of whom sued under pseudonyms) for whom pregnancy posed a substantial risk of severe disability or death.⁴⁸ As in the earlier Tileston litigation, Buxton and his co-plaintiffs brought an unsuccessful declaratory judgment action in Connecticut state court and appealed from the Connecticut Supreme Court's ruling rejecting their arguments.⁴⁹

With the procedural deficiencies that had plagued the earlier Tileston appeal seemingly resolved, the path to a Supreme Court ruling on the merits seemed clear. But addressing the "who" questions at the center of the standing inquiry did not answer the separate "when" questions that regulate the timing of constitutional adjudication.⁵⁰ The Tileston Court had briefly noted such concerns in its per curiam opinion but its resolution of the standing question had rendered it unnecessary to decide whether the declaratory nature of the relief sought rendered the case non-justiciable.⁵¹

By the time the second set of appeals reached the Supreme Court under the caption Poe v. Ullman,⁵² these timing issues were very much the focal point of jurisdictional concern. Justice Frankfurter's opinion for a four-Justice plurality emphasized the apparent paucity of reported prosecutions under the Connecticut statute, asserting that there had been only one such prosecution "[d]uring the more than three-quarters of a century since [the statute's] enactment," and dismissing that prosecution as a mere "test case."⁵³ Implicitly acknowledging that the petitioners had made out a sufficient "case or controversy" for Article III purposes, Frankfurter invoked the self-limiting principles articulated in Brandeis's Ashwander concurrence as support for his conclusion that the petitioners' appeal lacked "the immediacy which is an indispensable condition of constitutional adjudication."⁵⁴

Justice Brennan provided the critical fifth vote against reaching the merits. Brennan refused to join Frankfurter's opinion but agreed that the petitioners' appeal did not present "a real and substantial controversy which unequivocally calls for adjudication of the rights claimed in advance of any attempt by the State to curtail them by criminal prosecution."⁵⁵ Critical to Brennan's conclusion was the fact that Connecticut had not sought to prevent "the use of contraceptives by isolated and individual married couples" but had instead focused its enforcement efforts on preventing "the opening of birth-control clinics on a large scale."⁵⁶ Brennan saw this as the "true controversy in th[e] case,"⁵⁷ and he concluded that there would be "time enough to decide the constitutional questions urged upon us when, if ever, that real controversy flares up again."⁵⁸

50 Cf. Henry P. Monaghan, Constitutional Adjudication: The Who and When, 82 YALE L.J. 1363, 1364 (1973) (describing justiciability doctrines as fundamentally concerned with determining "who may obtain constitutional declarations and when").

In dissent, Justice Harlan took issue with this characterization, observing that "the respect in which Nelson was a test case is only that it was brought [by the State] for the purpose of making entirely clear the State's power and willingness to enforce" the statute. Id. at 533 (Harlan, J., dissenting); see also Dudziak, supra note 11, at 920–24 (describing the background of the Nelson case).

The majority's holding drew lengthy dissents from both Justice Harlan and Justice Douglas.⁵⁹ While professing his "unreserved[]" support for the "policy against premature constitutional decision,"⁶⁰ Harlan nonetheless faulted the plurality and Justice Brennan for "postulat[ing] a security from prosecution for open defiance of the statute which I do not believe the record supports."⁶¹ Justice Douglas was more adamant in condemning the choice to which the petitioners would be put by the majority's ruling:

What are these people—doctor and patients—to do? Flout the law and go to prison? Violate the law surreptitiously and hope they will not get caught? By today's decision we leave them no other alternatives. It is not the choice they need have under the regime of the declaratory judgment and our constitutional system. It is not the choice worthy of a civilized society. . . . We should not turn them away and make them flout the law and get arrested to have their constitutional rights determined.⁶²

As Douglas's remarks suggested, the Court's opinions in Tileston and Poe left open only one reasonably clear path for forcing the question of the Connecticut law's constitutionality onto the Court's agenda—someone needed to "get arrested." After some deliberation, this was the path that Connecticut birth control advocates chose to pursue. In November 1961, Planned Parenthood of Connecticut opened a birth control clinic at its headquarters in New Haven.⁶³ Within two weeks of opening, the New Haven police arrested the clinic's Medical Director, Dr. Buxton, and its Executive Director, Estelle Griswold, for violating the 1879 statute.⁶⁴ Following yet another trip through the Connecticut state court system and yet another opinion from the Connecticut Supreme Court upholding the statute, the constitutional challenge to the Connecticut law was again ready to go before the Supreme Court. Griswold v. Connecticut had at long last arrived.

But even at this point, a ruling on the merits was not without obstacles. The state's decision to prosecute Buxton and Griswold obviated the ripeness objections that had stood in the way of resolving Poe. But the standing difficulties that had plagued Dr. Tileston's appeal two decades earlier once more reared their heads. As Brennan predicted, the state had not focused its enforcement efforts on the intimate activities of particular married couples but rather on those who sought to provide contraceptives in publicly accessible clinics. To the extent Buxton and Griswold hoped to challenge the law's constitutionality based on its interference with marital privacy, their arguments bore an uncomfortable resemblance to Dr. Tileston's earlier effort to vindicate the rights of his third-party patients.

By 1965, however, the Court no longer seemed interested in grappling with the intricacies of third-party standing as a means of avoiding constitutional questions. An important development in this regard was the retirement in 1963 of Justice Frankfurter, who had long been one of the Court's leading proponents of jurisdictional restraint.⁶⁵ Even before Frankfurter's retirement, the Court had begun stretching the boundaries of its self-imposed jurisdictional limits, most notably in Baker v. Carr,⁶⁶ where the Court refashioned more than a century of precedent under the political question doctrine in order to allow for greater judicial oversight of the political process.⁶⁷ This trend toward more relaxed standing and justiciability doctrines would continue in the years following Griswold.⁶⁸

In Griswold itself, the standing question was disposed of relatively briskly. Justice Douglas's majority opinion—the only opinion in the case to mention standing—distinguished Tileston on the ground that the plaintiff in that case sought only declaratory relief.⁶⁹ After citing several cases in which parties had been allowed to rely upon the constitutional interests of others, Douglas asserted that “[t]he rights of husband and wife, pressed here, are likely to be diluted or adversely affected unless those rights are considered in a suit involving those who have this kind of confidential relation to them.”⁷⁰

The decisions in Tileston, Poe, and Griswold, considered together, provide illuminating snapshot views of three important moments in the evolution of standing doctrine during the middle decades of the twentieth century. Tileston arrived as the Court's newly dominant cohort of Roosevelt appointees was busy consolidating the constitutional victories of the so-called New Deal “revolution.” The restrictive standing limitations to which Dr. Tileston's appeal fell victim were part of that consolidation, as the Court's dominant liberal faction sought to limit opportunities for judicial review of New Deal regulatory programs.⁷¹ By the time Poe reached the Court in 1961, liberal support for restrictive justiciability limits had begun to crumble.⁷² Though Frankfurter and a few other holdouts continued to adhere to a strongly self-limiting vision of justiciability, other of the Court's leading liberals, including Justices Black and Douglas, had come to embrace a more permissive view that would allow the Court to decide a broader range of constitutional questions.⁷³ By the time of Griswold four years later, the Warren Court was well on its way toward developing the latitudinarian justiciability doctrines with which that Court is typically associated.

II. THE PATH (BACK) TO SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS

One of Griswold's most enduring doctrinal legacies involves its contribution to the late twentieth-century resurgence of substantive due process.⁷⁴ But in order to understand the case's significance in this respect, one must get past a simplifying myth that has grown up around that controversial doctrine. According to this myth, substantive due process perished with the so-called "switch in time" of 1937 only to reemerge suddenly and unexpectedly in Griswold and later decisions of the Warren and Burger Courts.⁷⁵ While this myth bears certain elements of truth, it can be highly misleading if taken as an accurate characterization of the mid-twentieth century status of "substantive due process" as a constitutional concept.

The decisions of the Stone and Vinson Courts clearly established that the Court would not use the Due Process Clauses to police economic regulations. The edentulous "rational basis" test, which received its canonical formulation in Justice Douglas's 1955 opinion in Williamson v. Lee Optical, Inc.,⁷⁶ unmistakably signaled that those seeking judicial protection of economic rights would face long odds in securing redress before the Supreme Court. But contrary to the assumptions of many modern commentators, the Court's newfound hostility toward economic substantive due process did not signal a similarly hostile attitude toward substantive due process more generally.

There were, however, relatively few pre-1937 substantive due process precedents that focused specifically on non-economic rights. A handful of cases from the early twentieth century had begun the process of extending substantive due process beyond the economic sphere, including Pierce v. Soci-

Conkle, The Second Death of Substantive Due Process, 62 IND. ety of Sisters, Meyer v. Nebraska, and Farrington v. Tokushige, all of which involved the rights of parents to direct their children's education.⁷⁷ In a closely related line of cases decided during the same period, the Court had also begun to recognize areas of overlap between the "liberty" protected against state infringement by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause and the specific guarantees set forth in the Bill of Rights.⁷⁸ To complicate matters further, this latter line of decisions coexisted with a separate body of cases specifically declaring that certain other Bill of Rights protections were not embraced by the Fourteenth Amendment.⁷⁹

The post–New Deal Court eventually settled on an approach that preserved the precedential significance of most of its earlier non-economic due process decisions while signaling that the degree of overlap between a particular claimed "liberty" and some other textually specified right—particularly those set forth in the Bill of Rights—would matter greatly to the Court's assessment of constitutionality.⁸⁰ Beginning with Justice Cardozo's 1937 opinion in Palko v. Connecticut,⁸¹ the Court gradually set about the difficult task of rationalizing the various doctrinal threads of its earlier substantive due process case law into a coherent account of the relationship between the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause and the Bill of Rights.⁸²

By the late 1940s, at least three distinct positions regarding the relationship between the Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights had come to be embraced by different factions on the Court. These three positions were Soc'y of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) (invalidating a law mandating education in public, rather than private schools); Meyer v. REV. 459, 496–512 (2001) (discussing the post–New Deal Court's increasing emphasis on textual considerations in identifying constitutionally protected due process "liberty"). The famous "footnote four" of Carolene Products suggested this new approach by declaring that the "presumption of constitutionality" attaching to most state lawmaking may have a "narrower scope for operation" when the challenged "legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution." United States v. Carolene Prods. Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152 n.4 (1938).

illustrated by the competing opinions in Adamson v. California.⁸³ One position, endorsed by the majority opinion of Justice Reed as well as by the separate concurrence of Justice Frankfurter, attached relatively little significance to the existence of a similar textual guarantee in the Bill of Rights. Rather, the critical inquiry focused on whether the right in question was sufficiently fundamental to be recognized as “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,” thus meriting protection under the Due Process Clause.⁸⁴ As Frankfurter explained in his concurrence, this view conceived of the Due Process Clause as “inescapably impos[ing] upon th[e] Court an exercise of judgment” to determine whether a challenged practice “offend[s] those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples.”⁸⁵

Justice Black’s dissent, which Douglas joined, endorsed an approach that Akhil Amar has characterized as “mechanical incorporation.”⁸⁶ Under this alternative conception, which reflected the view to which Black would adhere throughout his long career on the Court, the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process and Privileges or Immunities Clauses are effectively read as “simply terms of art referring to the first eight amendments in every jot and tittle, and to nothing else.”⁸⁷

A third view of the relationship between the Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights was reflected in the separate dissenting opinion of Justice Murphy (joined by Justice Rutledge), who agreed with Black and Douglas “that the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights should be carried over intact into the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment” but resisted the implied corollary “that the [Fourteenth Amendment] is entirely and necessarily limited by the Bill of Rights.”⁸⁸

Though the Court’s attention in the substantive due process sphere during the 1940s and 1950s focused primarily on identifying areas of overlap between the requirements of due process and specific Bill of Rights guarantees, the problem of “unenumerated” rights did not go wholly unaddressed. In an important 1952 opinion authored by Frankfurter, the Court held that admitting evidence obtained by forcibly pumping a suspect’s stomach “shock[ed] the conscience” of the Court and therefore violated the defendant’s due process rights.⁸⁹ That same year, the Court held that denial of public employment based solely on membership in an organization designated by the state as “subversive” constituted an “assertion of arbitrary power” that “offends due process.”⁹⁰ Two years later, in Bolling v. Sharpe, the Court famously relied upon the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause in holding that the federal government, like the states, was prohibited from maintaining a system of racially segregated public schools.⁹¹ And in Schwartz v. Board of Bar Examiners, decided in 1957, the Court concluded that the Due Process Clause precluded states from excluding persons from admission to the practice of law based solely on their past membership in the Communist Party.⁹²

The approach adopted by the Court in these cases differed markedly from its approach in cases involving “incorporation” of particular Bill of Rights guarantees. Outside the incorporation context, substantive due process review during the 1940s and 1950s typically focused on policing particularly “arbitrary” or egregious state conduct.⁹³ But in cases that implicated the incorporation issue, the Court adopted a different standard that focused on whether the particular liberty interest in question was “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty”⁹⁴ or occupied a “preferred position”⁹⁵ in the hierarchy of rights and thus should be singled out for particularly strong constitutional protection.⁹⁶

By the end of the 1950s the distinction between these two lines of substantive due process doctrine had begun to blur. An important early challenge to the distinction arrived in 1952 in the context of a case challenging a decision by Washington, D.C.’s public transit regulator to allow the broadcast of radio programs in buses and streetcars. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit concluded that the policy violated the passengers’ Fifth Amendment due process rights, holding that “forced listening” would destroy the “[f]reedom of attention,” which was “a part of liberty essential to individuals and to society.”⁹⁷ The Supreme Court reversed, holding that “[t]he liberty of each individual in a public vehicle or public place is subject to reasonable limitations in relation to the rights of others.”⁹⁸ Justice Black concurred in the Court's due process holding but dissented in part on First Amendment grounds.⁹⁹

Justice Douglas, who had joined Black's Adamson dissent only three years earlier, rejected both the majority's reasoning and Black's effort to fit the case into a pure First Amendment framework.¹⁰⁰ Instead, Douglas essentially adopted the lower court's position that the forced listening to which passengers had been subjected violated their substantive "liberty" interests protected by the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause.¹⁰¹ "Liberty in the constitutional sense," wrote Douglas, "must mean more than freedom from unlawful governmental restraint; it must include privacy as well, if it is to be a repository of freedom. The right to be let alone is indeed the beginning of all freedom."¹⁰²

Six years later, in Kent v. Dulles,¹⁰³ a majority of the Court for the first time suggested a willingness to consider certain non-textually specified rights as warranting the type of heightened protection for which Douglas had argued in his Pollak dissent. Technically, the Court's holding in Kent addressed only a question of statutory interpretation—narrowly construing the President's statutory authority to "designate and prescribe" rules concerning the issuance of passports.¹⁰⁴ But this narrow construction was itself premised on the Court's assumption that "[t]he right to travel" was "a part of the 'liberty' of which the citizen cannot be deprived without due process of law under the Fifth Amendment," a freedom that the Court characterized as both "deeply engrained in our history" and "basic in our scheme of values."¹⁰⁵

Any lingering uncertainty regarding the constitutional status of the right to travel was put to rest by Justice Goldberg's 1964 opinion for the Court in Aptheker v. Secretary of State.¹⁰⁶ In that opinion, Goldberg reaffirmed the Court's earlier declaration in Kent "that the right to travel abroad is 'an important aspect of the citizen's liberty' guaranteed in the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment."¹⁰⁷ More importantly, Goldberg relied upon this newly recognized due process liberty not merely to narrowly construe a statute, as had been done in Kent, but rather to hold a federal statute "unconstitutional on its face."¹⁰⁸

Situating the Griswold opinions within these mid-twentieth-century debates regarding substantive due process and the relationship between the Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights sheds useful light on the nature of the doctrinal innovation that Griswold itself represented. Griswold is often characterized as having “revived” a line of substantive due process precedents that had lain dormant since the pre–New Deal period.¹⁰⁹ But whatever accuracy this characterization may hold, it must be qualified by recognition of the fairly significant body of post–New Deal substantive due process precedent that existed in 1965.¹¹⁰

The most explicit endorsement of substantive due process as a basis for the Court’s holding in Griswold was provided by Justice Harlan’s separate concurrence, which essentially incorporated by reference Harlan’s own earlier dissent in Poe v. Ullman. At first glance, the relatively conservative Harlan might seem like an unlikely champion of the open-ended due process theory articulated in his Poe and Griswold opinions.¹¹¹ But this flexible and open-ended interpretation of the Due Process Clause was entirely in keeping with the approach preferred by Justice Harlan and his fellow conservatives, who repeatedly invoked this vision of due process in the incorporation context as a means of allowing state decision makers a wider ambit of authority than would have been permitted by the total incorporation approach favored by Justices Douglas and Black.¹¹² Though the influence of this particular mode of due process analysis had already begun to wane in the incorporation context by 1965,¹¹³ Justice Harlan’s opinions in Griswold and Poe helped to ensure that the conservatives’ vision of due process as a broad and flexible guarantor of “fundamental” individual rights continued to exert a strong influence over cases decided outside the context of the “incorporation” controversy.¹¹⁴

III. THE PATH TO THE NINTH AMENDMENT

One of the most remarkable features of Griswold—both at the time of the decision and in retrospect—involved the decision by both Justice Douglas and, more pointedly, Justice Goldberg, to invoke the Ninth Amendment¹¹⁵ as support for invalidating the Connecticut law. Given the prevailing assumption that the Ninth Amendment had gone virtually unnoticed since its adoption more than a century and a half earlier,¹¹⁶ the Justices’ willingness to give that Amendment new vitality struck many observers as little short of “astonishing.”¹¹⁷

The individual-rights-focused gloss Justice Goldberg placed on the Ninth Amendment has cast a long shadow over subsequent academic and judicial discussions of the Amendment.¹¹⁸ By claiming to have located a specific textual source that would support extending judicial protection to unenumerated individual rights, Justice Goldberg’s concurrence promised a way forward for unenumerated rights protection that would avoid both the “Lochnerian” overtones of Justice Harlan’s “pure” substantive due process approach and the seeming eccentricity of Justice Douglas’s “penumbral” approach.¹¹⁹

This reading did not, however, originate with Justice Goldberg. Principal credit for the mid-twentieth century revival of interest in the Ninth Amendment belongs to Bennett B. Patterson and his 1955 book, The Forgotten

114 See, e.g., Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 756 & n.4 (1997) (Souter, J., concurring) (characterizing Justice Harlan’s Poe dissent as the foundation for the Court’s modern substantive due process jurisprudence).

115 U.S. CONST. amend. IX (“The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.”).

116 Justice Goldberg claimed that “this Court has had little occasion to interpret the Ninth Amendment” and declared in a footnote that he had been able to locate only three prior Supreme Court discussions of the Ninth Amendment. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 490–91 & n.6 (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring). For an argument that Justice Goldberg overlooked a significant body of Ninth Amendment case law from the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, see Kurt T. Lash, The Lost Jurisprudence of the Ninth Amendment, 83 TEX. L. REV. 597, 710 (2005).

117 See, e.g., Emerson, supra note 22, at 227 (noting “the astonishment of many observers” at the Justices’ willingness to “consider the ninth amendment as a basis for invalidating” the statute); Alfred H. Ninth Amendment.¹²⁰ Patterson, a practicing attorney in Texas, was hardly a likely figure to inspire a serious academic debate regarding constitutional interpretation. But his book and the theory of the Ninth Amendment it espoused have had a lasting impact on judicial and academic discussions of the Amendment.¹²¹

Patterson characterized the Ninth Amendment as potentially “the most significant and forceful clause in the entire Constitution” and the only constitutional provision that “makes a declaration of the sovereignty and dignity of the individual.”¹²² Though he acknowledged the existence of “a number of cases which briefly mention[ed]” the Amendment “by grouping it with the Tenth Amendment,” Patterson asserted that these cases were “actually” about the Tenth Amendment and did not address the meaning of the Ninth.¹²³ With the bulk of pre–New Deal case law discussing the Ninth Amendment thus disposed of, Patterson was free to characterize the Amendment as an essentially “forgotten” provision that had been included in the Bill of Rights as a “basic statement of the inherent natural rights of the individual.”¹²⁴

Initial reaction to Patterson’s book was less than favorable. A reviewer in the Notre Dame Lawyer lamented that Patterson’s argument “never jells into complete intelligibility” and dismissed his interpretation as “a melange of nineteenth century laissez faire theory and eighteenth century contractarianism.”¹²⁵ Another reviewer similarly criticized Patterson’s argument as reflecting “an amazing reversion to . . . the wholly discredited [natural law] philosophy.”¹²⁶ A particularly caustic review published in the Vanderbilt Law Review suggested that Patterson’s arguments might induce readers to conclude “that it is just as well the Ninth Amendment has been forgotten.”¹²⁷

Arriving as it did at the height of the legal process school’s ascendance within the legal academy, the critical reaction to Patterson’s book—with its overtones of natural law and unbounded judicial discretion—was perhaps to be expected.¹²⁸ Somewhat more surprising was the fact that Patterson’s arguments did not fade entirely from the public legal consciousness following their harsh initial reception. Two articles published in the late 1950s—one by Tulane law professor Mitchell Franklin and the other by former Roosevelt Justice Department official O. John Rogge—gave Patterson’s arguments a relatively respectful treatment, while stopping short of fully endorsing his expansive view of the Ninth Amendment's role in the constitutional scheme.¹²⁹

But the crucial development that would elevate Patterson's theory to a position of true academic respectability arrived in the form of a 1962 law review article by Professor Norman Redlich.¹³⁰ Redlich opened his article by observing that the era epitomized by the "Adamson [c]ontroversy," which focused on the relationship between the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment, was drawing to a close.¹³¹ Noting that the Court had already "incorporated" many of the most significant Bill of Rights guarantees, Redlich cautioned that "we may be approaching an era where human dignity and liberty will require the protection of rights other than those contained in the first eight amendments."¹³²

Redlich took as his central example of a case illustrating the possible need for additional rights protection the "well-publicized case concerning the constitutionality of Connecticut's birth control laws."¹³³ Redlich rejected the "flexible due process" approach reflected in Justice Harlan's Poe dissent, noting the "grave danger that Justices may fail to regard as fundamental the more important provisions of the Bill of Rights."¹³⁴ A better approach, in Redlich's view, lay in reinvigorating the Ninth Amendment as a restraint on state and federal power.¹³⁵ Echoing Patterson's individual-rights-focused interpretation, Redlich argued that the Ninth Amendment reflected the Framers' recognition that "there were rights, not enumerated in the Constitution, which were 'retained . . . by the people,' and that because the people possessed such rights there were powers which neither the federal government nor the states possessed."¹³⁶

Redlich's gloss on Patterson's Ninth Amendment theory had immediate influence, most significantly on Yale law professor Fowler Harper, one of the lawyers representing Griswold and Buxton.¹³⁷ Inspired by Redlich, Harper incorporated a Ninth Amendment argument into the appellate brief he submitted to the Supreme Court, contending that the Amendment "should be interpreted to protect aspects of what has been called the rights of privacy as a protection additional to that afforded by other Amendments."¹³⁸ And though only two paragraphs of the appellants' merits brief mentioned the Ninth Amendment specifically,¹³⁹ the Amendment would play an important role in the Justices' internal deliberations regarding the case.¹⁴⁰

Following oral argument, it was clear that seven Justices would vote to reverse the convictions. But no single rationale attracted the support of five Justices. Justice Douglas's draft opinion had already garnered the support of Justices Brennan, Goldberg, and Clark. But Chief Justice Warren was skeptical of both that approach and Justice Harlan's "pure" substantive due process rationale. After some initial dithering, the Chief Justice indicated that he would join Justice White's opinion, which concurred in the judgment but not in the reasoning of any of the other opinions. Had this alignment held, Griswold would have been decided on a plurality basis with no single opinion attracting majority support.¹⁴¹

Justice Goldberg, sensing the Chief Justice's dissatisfaction with Justice Douglas's draft, tasked one of his clerks—future Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer—with drafting a separate concurrence focusing particularly on the Ninth Amendment. Chief Justice Warren found the resulting opinion sufficiently persuasive to switch his vote from Justice White's opinion to Justice Goldberg's newly drafted concurrence. And though Chief Justice Warren refrained from joining Douglas's opinion directly, Justice Goldberg opened his opinion with a statement of general agreement with Justice Douglas's reasoning, allowing the Chief Justice's vote to be imputed to Douglas's opinion and producing a clear five-vote majority.¹⁴²

The critical role of Justice Goldberg's Ninth Amendment argument in capturing Chief Justice Warren's vote illustrates an underappreciated aspect of the Court that bears Warren's name. It has become commonplace to characterize the Warren Court as one that cared little about text or original understanding.¹⁴³ But as Professor Frank Cross has shown, at least when judged by their choice of interpretive sources, the Warren Court Justices were not appreciably less "originalist" than their predecessors.¹⁴⁴ To the contrary, citations to interpretive sources typically associated with originalist interpretation—such as The Federalist and the records of debates in the Philadelphia Convention and in the state ratifying conventions—reached new highs during Chief Justice Warren's tenure.¹⁴⁵ And while it is, of course, difficult to arrive at objectively verifiable determinations regarding the actual influence of such sources, avowedly originalist arguments did feature prominently in several of the Court's most significant and controversial constitutional decisions.¹⁴⁶ It is likely no coincidence that the first prominent complaints by professional historians about judicial misuse of "law office history" began to emerge during these years.¹⁴⁷

Even if one accepts the view that some or all of the Warren Court Justices viewed historical arguments of this kind as little more than a fig leaf for results reached on other grounds,¹⁴⁸ it would not necessarily warrant the conclusion that the fig leaf itself was unimportant. Even Justices who may have been unwilling to follow the historical evidence to a result they deemed unpalatable may nonetheless have viewed the availability of a historically grounded rationale as a relevant factor in choosing a doctrinal framework within which to rationalize a desired result. At a minimum, the availability of the individual-rights interpretation of the Ninth Amendment may have provided some level of psychological comfort to some Justices by reassuring them that a strong doctrine of unenumerated rights protection could be reconciled with (or at least could be made to appear reconcilable with) the constitutional design that the Framers envisioned.

IV. THE PATH TO "PENUMBRAS" AND "EMANATIONS"

Of course, neither the Ninth Amendment nor substantive due process provided the analytic framework for the opinion that would serve as the official statement endorsed by a majority of five Justices. That opinion, authored by Justice Douglas, instead identified a novel explanatory account of how the Constitution protected a freestanding right to privacy, which was inspired by multiple Bill of Rights provisions but immediately traceable to none. In Justice Douglas's memorable phrasing, the "specific guarantees in the Bill of Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254, 273–77 (1964) (invoking the late eighteenth-century controversy over the Alien and Sedition Acts as grounds for speech-protective restrictions on libel actions); Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964) (invoking the records of the Philadelphia Convention and The Federalist in holding that congressional districts must be equal in size); *Engel v. 147 The still-classic statement of this critique—and the one in which the phrase "law office history" was originally coined—arrived the same year as Griswold and offered Justice Goldberg's Ninth Amendment argument as an illustration of the phenomenon. See Kelly, supra note 117, at 122, 149–55; see also Mark DeWolfe Howe, Split Decisions, N.Y. REV. Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance.”¹⁴⁹

To characterize Justice Douglas’s “penumbras” and “emanations” reasoning as unsuccessful would be an understatement. The line is at once among the most widely recognized statements written by Justice Douglas during his long judicial career and “one of the most ridiculed sentences in the annals of the Supreme Court.”¹⁵⁰ Douglas’s reasoning has struck many observers as so far beyond the pale of conventional constitutional reasoning as to defy explanation.¹⁵¹

Before probing into the logic underlying Justice Douglas’s “penumbras and emanations” approach, it will be useful to take a step back and consider how un-remarkable some of the general ideas animating his opinion may have seemed in 1965. Though the concept of a legal “right to privacy” originated in tort law, the concept soon found its way into the constitutional realm through the intervention of one of its principal originators—Justice Brandeis.¹⁵² In his famous 1928 dissent in Olmstead v. United States, Justice Brandeis identified privacy as the key animating value underlying the Fourth Amendment and equated that provision with the Founders’ recognition of a “right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men.”¹⁵³ During the years following World War II, privacy ideas gradually spread to adjacent doctrines, becoming associated with not only the Fourth Amendment, but also the First Amendment freedoms of speech and association.¹⁵⁴ By the early 1960s, privacy ideas had so proliferated through constitutional doctrine that Harvard Law Dean Erwin Griswold¹⁵⁵ could refer to Justice Brandeis’s “right to be let alone” as “the underlying theme of the Bill of Rights.”¹⁵⁶

Nor was the idea that the Constitution might protect a free-standing substantive “right to privacy” completely off the wall in 1965. Justice Douglas himself had embraced the idea as early as 1952 in his Pollak dissent.¹⁵⁷ And both he and Harlan had embraced versions of the idea in their separate dissenting opinions in Poe.¹⁵⁸ Professor Redlich's 1962 article endorsing a revival of the Ninth Amendment had argued for an unenumerated privacy right in terms very similar to those reflected in Justice Douglas's Griswold opinion, urging courts to look to "the entire Constitution" in order to identify rights "adjacent to, or analogous to" textually specified rights.¹⁵⁹ And two years before Griswold, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit had held that a section 1983 damages action could be maintained against government officials based on an alleged violation of the plaintiff's "privacy," which the Ninth Circuit concluded was "comprehended within the 'liberty' of which one may not be deprived without due process of law."¹⁶⁰

Given the existence of a reasonable amount of preexisting precedential and intellectual support for viewing privacy as both a key theme underlying the Bill of Rights and as a freestanding constitutional interest warranting judicial protection, why did Justice Douglas's effort to extrapolate such a right from various Bill of Rights guarantees fall so flat? Part of the blame must undoubtedly be placed on the opinion itself.¹⁶¹ Justice Douglas's explanation for how he derived a right to privacy from the specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights was so "convoluted," "confusing," and "opaque"¹⁶² that a small cottage industry of scholarship has grown up around the project of trying to figure out exactly what he was trying to say.¹⁶³

The conventional explanation of Justice Douglas's opinion starts with the conception of particular Bill of Rights guarantees "emanat[ing]" a sphere of additional rights whose judicial protection is necessary to protect the core rights specified in the constitutional text.¹⁶⁴ So far so good. Though judicial enforcement of such “peripheral” or “prophylactic” rights is not entirely free from controversy, such rights are now a familiar part of constitutional law.¹⁶⁵ Nor is it wholly implausible that certain activities might fall within the periphery of multiple constitutionally protected rights or that the existence of such overlap might affect the judicial assessment of how much protection those activities should receive. But Justice Douglas’s Griswold opinion failed to connect the dots by showing that the ability of married couples to use contraceptives was necessary to the protection of any of the “core” textually enumerated rights to which he referred. How, for example, would protecting the “peripheral” right to contraceptive use protect the “core” Third Amendment right against having troops quartered in one’s private home?¹⁶⁶ Instead, some of Douglas’s language conveys the impression of what Robert Bork derided as a “miracle of transubstantiation”—the transformation of various peripheral rights into an entirely new and freestanding “core” right.¹⁶⁷

There is, however, another way of understanding what Douglas may have had in mind. Professor David Luban has provided a sympathetic reconstruction of Douglas’s opinion that rejects the conventional view’s starting point—namely, that Douglas conceived of the right to privacy as a peripheral protection necessary to protect the core Bill of Rights guarantees.¹⁶⁸ Rather, Luban argues that Douglas conceived the privacy right itself as the background principle or purpose that motivated the adoption of particular textually specified provisions. On this understanding, the right to privacy is not a mere peripheral right that is necessary to protect “core” interests underlying enumerated rights, such as the First, Third, and Fourth Amendments; rather the right to privacy is itself the core interest and the textually specified guarantees are the peripheral rights that were adopted, in whole or in part, for the purpose of protecting individuals’ core interest in privacy.¹⁶⁹

When understood in this way, Justice Douglas’s key interpretive moves—i.e., identifying a perceived background “purpose” underlying the textually expressed language of the Constitution and then giving that perceived purpose direct legal effect—were fully consistent with the Warren Court’s preferred interpretive approach. As Professors William Eskridge and Philip Frickey observe, the Warren Court’s statutory interpretation jurisprudence was characterized by a “strongly purposive” approach that “rendered the plain meaning rule virtually a dead letter.”¹⁷⁰ Justice Brennan had explicitly encouraged Douglas to pursue such a purposive approach to the Griswold opinion early in the drafting process. After reviewing Douglas’s initial draft, which proposed to ground the right to marital privacy in the First Amendment freedom of association, Justice Brennan urged him to take a different tack that focused less explicitly on text and more centrally on the underlying purposes of the Bill of Rights:

Instead of expanding the First Amendment right of association to include marriage, why not say that what has been done for the First Amendment can also be done for some of the other fundamental guarantees of the Bill of Rights? In other words, where fundamentals are concerned, the Bill of Rights guarantees are but expressions or examples of those rights, and do not preclude applications or extensions of those rights to situations unanticipated by the Framers.¹⁷¹

Had Douglas followed this advice and written a more overtly purposive opinion—rather than straining for an obscure astronomical metaphor—his opinion might very well have been better received, or at least better understood, by subsequent generations of commentators.

Of course, to say that Douglas’s Griswold opinion can be understood as reflecting a (somewhat) recognizable form of conventional legal reasoning is not to say that either the reasoning itself or its application was uncontroversial. The Warren Court’s strongly purposive interpretive methods often came in for criticism, both from other Justices writing in dissent and from outside commentators.¹⁷² And one need hardly be a die-hard textualist to believe that “when the Constitution sought to protect private rights it specified them” and that its explicit protection of “some elements of privacy, but not others,” therefore “suggests that it did not mean to protect those not mentioned.”¹⁷³

Perhaps most critically, Justice Douglas defied convention by refusing to tie his structurally derived right to privacy back into the interpretation of some particular textually specified right. Earlier efforts to justify such a right had started with reasoning similar to Douglas's but ultimately honed in on a particular textual provision as the authoritative source of the right in question, such as the Ninth Amendment or the Due Process Clauses. The type of free-form structural reasoning attempted by Douglas was not wholly alien to American constitutional practice.¹⁷⁴ But it remained (and remains) a deeply controversial interpretive move—at least when the structurally derived principle is not eventually tied back to the interpretation of some specific textual provision as to which there is some reasonable level of ambiguity.¹⁷⁵

Douglas's refusal to connect his "penumbral" theory of privacy to a particular constitutional provision is conventionally attributed to his presumed hostility toward substantive due process.¹⁷⁶ This explanation is complicated, however, by Douglas's embrace of substantive due process in earlier opinions, including his Pollak dissent,¹⁷⁷ his majority opinion in Kent v. Dulles,¹⁷⁸ and his dissenting opinion in Poe v. Ullman from just four years earlier.¹⁷⁹ In each of those opinions, Douglas had relied upon an unambiguously "substantive" interpretation of due process liberty as a basis for extending constitutional protection to non-textually grounded rights. Douglas's Griswold opinion, by contrast, contained only a single reference to the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause, which appears in a passage designed to distance the opinion from the philosophy of *Lochner v. New York*¹⁸⁰ and other cases from the pre–New Deal era.¹⁸¹

174 See, e.g., Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 35, 43–49 (1867) (inferring a prohibition on state interference with interstate movement of citizens based largely on structural reasoning regarding the relationships between the states, citizens, and the federal government). The now-classic defense of this form of structural reasoning as a legitimate method of constitutional argument would not appear until four years after Griswold was handed down. See CHARLES L. BLACK, JR., STRUCTURE AND RELATIONSHIP IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 3–32 (1969).

It is not clear why Douglas shifted away from the more straightforward substantive due process rationale he had relied upon in Poe and earlier cases in favor of his newly fashioned “penumbral” theory. But whatever the reason, Douglas’s refusal to connect his theory of constitutional privacy to any particular constitutional provision rendered his Griswold opinion too eccentric to provide a strong foundation for the subsequent development of the Court’s unenumerated rights jurisprudence. Eight years later in Roe v. Wade, the Court itself would tacitly acknowledge this point by, somewhat awkwardly, re-grounding the constitutional right to privacy squarely in substantive due process.¹⁸²

V. THE PATH TO “STRICT SCRUTINY”

Identifying marital privacy as a constitutionally protected liberty interest—whether under Justice Douglas’s penumbral reasoning, Justice Goldberg’s Ninth Amendment theory, Justice Harlan’s “pure” substantive due process approach, or some other rationale—was not enough to resolve the constitutional challenge in Griswold. In addition to identifying the constitutional status of the right in question, the Court needed to assess that right in relation to Connecticut’s asserted interest in regulating the use of contraceptives by married couples. This aspect of the case implicated another important doctrinal development that was taking place during the period surrounding Griswold—namely, the rise of “strict scrutiny.”

Under contemporary doctrine, the strict scrutiny standard demands that the government be able to show that challenged measures “are narrowly tailored” and that they “further compelling governmental interests” in order to avoid a finding of unconstitutionality.¹⁸³ Despite its seeming present ubiquity, this standard is of relatively recent vintage. Courts of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries did not spend much time discussing the level of scrutiny they would apply in assessing the constitutionality of challenged legislation. Instead, judicial review during this period focused principally on conceptual line drawing, seeking to identify the proper ambit of state regulatory authority.¹⁸⁴ In general, cases falling within the conceptual 182 See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 153 (1973) (“This right of privacy, whether it be founded in the Fourteenth Amendment’s concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action, as we feel it is, or . . . in the Ninth Amendment’s reservation of rights to the people, is broad enough to encompass a woman’s decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy.”).

boundary lines drawn by the Court were deemed constitutional while those falling outside those boundaries were held unconstitutional.¹⁸⁵

This “boundary tracing” model of constitutional review did not survive the constitutional transformations that accompanied the New Deal. Beginning in the 1930s, the Court moved away from its focus on conceptual line-drawing in favor of a more capacious understanding of state regulatory authority.¹⁸⁶ But it was not immediately clear what model of constitutional review would replace the boundary-tracing model. The famous “footnote four” of Justice Stone’s Carolene Products opinion had signaled that the generous “presumption of constitutionality” attaching to most legislation might apply with lesser force in certain categories of cases.¹⁸⁷ But that opinion did not spell out how such a lessened presumption would be implemented or what judicial review under the new model would look like.

Beginning in the 1940s, language started appearing in some opinions suggesting that certain Bill of Rights guarantees—particularly the First Amendment freedoms of speech, press, and religion—would be singled out for particularly strong judicial protection.¹⁸⁸ But the Justices failed to agree on the precise significance of such heightened protection. Justice Frankfurter and other “low protectionists” generally viewed the involvement of a “preferred” liberty as doing little more than removing the question from the extremely lenient “rational basis” framework and subjecting the challenged governmental action to something more like a “reasonableness” standard.¹⁸⁹ By contrast, Justices Black and Douglas endorsed a strongly rights-protective standard that verged on absolute protection.¹⁹⁰

At around the same time the Justices were grappling with the “preferred position” doctrine in cases involving First Amendment liberties, the Court began to grapple with a closely related set of problems in the equal protection context. The first reference to “strict scrutiny” in a Supreme Court opinion came in Justice Douglas’s 1942 opinion for the Court in Skinner v. Oklahoma—a case involving a constitutional challenge to a law mandating compulsory sterilization for certain categories of offenders.¹⁹¹ Refusing to apply the deferential rational basis standard, Justice Douglas emphasized the “fundamental” nature of the liberty at stake, characterizing the right to procreate as “one of the basic civil rights of man” and one that was “fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race.”¹⁹² Justice Douglas thus urged that “strict scrutiny” of the legislative classification was “essential, lest . . . invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of just and equal laws.”¹⁹³

Despite the “potentially pathbreaking” implications of its decision, the Skinner Court “did not pause to specify what ‘strict scrutiny’ entailed,” and the “fundamental rights” equal protection framework the Court suggested went largely undeveloped over the next two decades.¹⁹⁴ Instead, equal protection doctrine in the years following Skinner focused almost exclusively on racial discrimination.¹⁹⁵ In Korematsu v. United States,¹⁹⁶ decided in 1944, the Court declared that “all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect” and that “courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny.”¹⁹⁷ It went on, however, to uphold the challenged military order excluding all persons of Japanese descent from certain designated areas of the West Coast.¹⁹⁸ Following World War II, the Court gave more bite to its “rigid scrutiny” standard in cases involving race, striking down a series of state laws discriminating against Japanese Americans and showing an increasing willingness to invalidate laws and policies involving racial segregation.¹⁹⁹ But even these cases stopped short of declaring that all race-based legal classifications would trigger “strict scrutiny” in its modern form, as did the Court’s landmark 1954 decisions invalidating racial segregation in public schools.²⁰⁰

Because the strict scrutiny formula emerged gradually and incrementally, it is difficult to pinpoint a single case in which the Court first recognized the modern version of the test.²⁰¹ There is, however, a growing scholarly consensus that the strict scrutiny standard began to take on its modern form during a period that was roughly contemporaneous with the Court's consideration of Griswold. For example, Professor Stephen Siegel locates "the development of the compelling interest standard and strict scrutiny in" a series of First Amendment cases decided during the "late 1950s and early 1960s."²⁰² Professor Michael Klarman has noted a similar set of transformations in the equal protection context during this period, identifying the mid-1960s as the period during which the Court first adopted a "presumptive rule against racial classifications"²⁰³ and revived the "fundamental rights strand of equal protection" that had lain dormant since Skinner in 1942.²⁰⁴ Combining these two sets of developments, Professor Richard Fallon argues that the modern strict scrutiny formula "evolved simultaneously in a number of doctrinal areas" during the 1960s, including First Amendment free exercise, freedom of speech, and freedom of association cases, as well as in both the racial classification and fundamental rights strands of equal protection doctrine.²⁰⁵

Although Justice Douglas's majority opinion in Griswold made no reference to "strict scrutiny" or any of the related concepts associated with the modern strict scrutiny standard, other opinions in the case borrowed freely from First Amendment and equal protection case law in considering the interests asserted by Connecticut in support of the statute. Professor Fallon singles out Justice Goldberg's concurring opinion as one that "at least arguably played a pioneering role in formulating strict scrutiny's canonical requirements."²⁰⁶ The key passage in Justice Goldberg's opinion declared: "Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling. The law must be shown necessary, and not merely rationally related, to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy."²⁰⁷ According to Fallon, this statement reflected "[t]he first articulation of the strict scrutiny test that is wholly consonant with formulations that have survived into the twenty-first century."²⁰⁸

And while Justice Goldberg perhaps deserves pride of place for bringing together the disparate strands that would eventually coalesce into the modern strict scrutiny formula, the opinions of other Justices in the case reflect broadly similar thinking regarding the standard by which to assess the constitutionality of Connecticut's contraception ban. Justice White's separate concurrence relied upon the same language Justice Goldberg had borrowed from an earlier First Amendment case as support for insisting upon a "compelling" state interest where a "significant encroachment upon personal liberty" was at issue.²⁰⁹ He further urged that such statutes must be "reasonably necessary" for the effectuation of a "legitimate and substantial state interest, and not arbitrary or capricious in application."²¹⁰ Justice Harlan's separate concurring opinion did not discuss the standard of review but his earlier dissenting opinion in Poe v. Ullman had quoted the "strict scrutiny" language from Skinner and indicated that "not only the underlying, moral purpose" at which the statute was aimed but also the state's "choice of means" would be "relevant to any Constitutional judgment."²¹¹

Considered collectively, the Griswold opinions thus clearly indicated that in future cases involving the newly recognized constitutional privacy right, the government would be required to show a "compelling" interest as well as some degree of means-ends tailoring to avoid a finding of unconstitutionality.²¹² This implication of the Court's decision was only bolstered by cases decided shortly after Griswold that employed compelling interest and narrow tailoring concepts in analogous doctrinal settings, particularly in cases involving the "fundamental rights" strand of equal protection doctrine.²¹³

Though the Griswold Court's recognition of a new "fundamental" right to privacy is the case's most famous contribution to modern doctrine, the Justices' suggestion that the newly recognized right would be assimilated to the developing "strict scrutiny" framework marked a significant innovation in its own right. The introduction of the compelling state interest and narrow tailoring criteria suggested a new model of unenumerated rights protection that had never before existed.²¹⁴ Under this new model, rights were not simply byproducts that existed by virtue of the state's presumptively limited regulatory authority (the model of rights protection that had predominated prior to the New Deal). Rather, the conception of unenumerated rights that the Warren Court embraced called for singling out values for particularly strong constitutional protection, even from actions that were concededly within the scope of the state's legitimate authority. When viewed in this light, Griswold and later cases can be seen not so much as involving a "revival" of substantive due process decision making from an earlier era—the frame in which the case is often discussed²¹⁵—but as marking an important innovation in the structure of rights protection under the Due Process Clauses.²¹⁶

CONCLUSION

It would strain plausibility to describe the outcome of Griswold as strictly a byproduct of incremental, internal developments in Supreme Court doctrine. Both the Justices themselves and the attorneys pressing the constitutional challenge to Connecticut's contraception ban recognized the limitations of existing doctrine as the principal "obstacle" standing in the way of the law's invalidation.²¹⁷ From this perspective, Griswold can thus be seen as a case in which the preexisting doctrinal resources were strained to reach a result that the Justices—and an overwhelming national majority—viewed as just. This is the perspective from which Griswold is commonly discussed.²¹⁸

At the same time, however, it is important to recognize that the doctrinal innovations with which Griswold has come to be associated did not spring forth ex nihilo. Rather, the Justices' attempt to explain why the Constitution should be understood to prohibit a law that all agreed was "uncommonly silly" implicated a number of important and ongoing doctrinal and jurisprudential debates regarding the institutional authority of the Supreme Court, the relationship between the Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights, the constraints placed on judicial review by constitutional text, history, and precedent, and the degree of deference owed to more democratically accountable decision makers. Viewing Griswold solely from the "outside"—as a creative judicial response to influences emanating from the broader society—risks missing the extent to which the Court's response was shaped and constrained by the need to situate the resulting decision within the broader framework of preexisting constitutional law.

Both the decades-long journey that the constitutional challenges to the Connecticut law were forced to navigate and the deeply fractured nature of the opinions the case produced speak to the seriousness with which the Justices approached this task, as well as their implicit recognition that “[w]hatever course the Court took, its action was bound to be pregnant with possibilities crucial to the development of the law in a vital area of American life.”²¹⁹ And though these possibilities were as yet only dimly glimpsed in 1965,²²⁰ the after-effects of Griswold continue to exert a powerful influence on both the theory and practice of constitutional law.²²¹
