Introduction: Essays in Honor of Professor Robert E. Rodes, Jr.

Richard W. Garnett
Notre Dame Law School

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarship.law.nd.edu/ndlr
Part of the Law Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://scholarship.law.nd.edu/ndlr/vol90/iss5/6

This Essay is brought to you for free and open access by the Notre Dame Law Review at NDLScholarship. It has been accepted for inclusion in Notre Dame Law Review by an authorized administrator of NDLScholarship. For more information, please contact lawdr@nd.edu.
ESSAYS

INTRODUCTION: ESSAYS IN HONOR OF PROFESSOR ROBERT E. RODES, JR.

Richard W. Garnett*

In a recent issue of the Notre Dame Law Review, Dean Nell Jessup Newton and others recalled and celebrated the life, work, and legacy of Professor Robert Rodes, “my teacher, colleague, and friend.”1 Professor Rodes was an insightful, wide-ranging, and creative scholar as well as a deeply good man. Several years ago, in a contribution to a volume of papers in his honor, I observed that:

For half a century, he has written thoughtfully, engagingly, and provocatively about an imposingly broad and diverse range of subjects: legal ethics and liberation theology, symbolic logic and symbolist jurisprudence, chastity and the Church of England, Catholic universities and canon law, and—of course—workman’s compensation for maritime employees.2

© Richard W. Garnett. Individuals and nonprofit institutions may reproduce and distribute copies of this Introduction in any format at or below cost, for educational purposes, so long as each copy identifies the author, provides a citation to the Notre Dame Law Review, and includes this provision in the copyright notice.

* Paul J. Schierl/Fort Howard Corporation Professor and Concurrent Professor of Political Science, University of Notre Dame; Director, Notre Dame Program on Church, State & Society.

He was also, of course, a pioneering scholar in the field of law and religion. In fact, he was hard at work on the manuscript of a book about religious freedom and church-state relations when he died. (The short introduction to that work was published in an earlier volume of the Notre Dame Law Review.)

It is fitting and commendable that the Notre Dame Law Review is publishing here two new essays by two wise and prolific scholars, both of whom have carefully engaged and generously appreciated Professor Rodes in their academic work and both of whom are more than worthy to carry on and help lead the conversations to which he contributed. Professor Samuel Levine is one of the leading legal-ethics and professional-responsibility scholars of his generation and—like Professor Rodes—has allowed insights and inspiration from his religious faith and tradition to enrich and deepen both the questions he asks and the answers he proposes. In his paper, Professor Levine considers a particular dimension of a large question—a large problem, really—that was of great and lasting interest to Professor Rodes, namely, what is the relevance of a lawyer’s role to questions about what lawyer should, and should not, do? Professor Marie Failinger is the former editor of the Journal of Law and Religion and one of a handful of scholars who can fairly be said to have helped invent and shape that field. Her contribution is, among other things, an illuminatingly “Lutheran” appreciation for Professor Rodes’s famous book Pilgrim Law, in which he “describe[d] the reality of a human life course, the hard, gritty task of a traveler wearing climbing over boulders and pushing beyond exhaustion to reach the next barren shelter on the path at night’s end.” As she notes, and as Professor Rodes contended, “the pilgrim journey is hard.” It is, however, a journey that Professor Rodes traveled admirably and at its end—which, of course, was only the beginning—I am confident he was happy to hear, “Well done, good and faithful servant.”

6 Id. at 1986.
7 Matthew 25:23 (Douay-Rheims).